on Tuesday said it has canceled stock exchange operator's probe into a breach of cybersecurity at the Tokyo Stock Exchange. The Financial Services Agency said in a statement Tuesday that it will ask the exchange to apologize for failing to conduct the probe thoroughly but will not penalize the exchange. (AP Photo/Shizuo Kambayashi) The Japanese Securities and Exchange Surveillance Commission has cancelled its investigation of the Tokyo Stock Exchange and will not penalize the exchange operator. The Financial Services Agency said in a statement Tuesday that it will ask the exchange to apologize for failing to conduct the probe thoroughly but will not penalize the exchange. The commission had repeatedly said it would not make any judgement on the investigation report filed by the exchange at the end of last year, which found the exchange had failed to properly deal with cases of stock manipulation and other illegal insider trading. The exchange had faced the risk of losing its license to operate for three years if it had been found guilty of illegal insider trading. The commission had been considering granting the exchange a waiver from penalties, but it decided against it after reviewing the exchange's explanation of its probe and documents obtained by the commission. The exchange said it was "unable to properly prevent illegal trading by insiders" after an investigation, a finding challenged by lawyers for affected companies. Numerous scandals have rocked the country's stock market in recent years, from insider trading to manipulation. The exchange in December launched an investigation into a fraudulent scheme by exchange insiders who manipulated price movements of shares based on rumors that company officials had decided to sell the stock. The exchange also admitted this month that as many as 500 front-running customers had complained they had been given unlawful privileged information of their trades, which is a breach of the exchange's rule. Newspaper "Nikkei" said there have been "about a half dozen similar cases," including one case in which some customers received the information as early as a month before the stock's price change. The firm, Orix Holdings, admitted to illegal disclosure of trading information to customers. It will be taking the exchange operator to court for damages. Separately, the exchange operator is facing a second investigation following 3ef4e8ef8d
